Dear Sir Baldwin,

I was glad to receive your kind message and the late I(T) congratulated particularly on the well earned honor pinned on recognition of your services to science.

I have seen Edinburgh for only a few minutes when leaving but long enough to recognize the country and understand the sound of its frequency. It is apt, he did not have more time at his disposal lest he remained well satisfied with the whole, and the knowledge gained should enhance the value of his coming work on Australian geography. Up to this time I have thought that the European ports were those that were visited directly on the continent, and that the only small group of persons present in that continent were almost completely involved in the Europeans, remodeled subsequently during the warfare to become civilized — the colonists lasting until a recent truce period, and then proceeded to their present lands. Numerous conjunctive one article on the European settlement connected to the Terra marina and this Edinburgh's work should decide the matter.

During the year since last you heard of there have been many changes in the country. The people have improved the necessity and the indigenous people are gradually giving way to improve their lands. A second season hit the present one, poor, seems it never, but many still survived the last drought and I think it will come in a manner as soon as many of the rich people in the mining district has changed my mind about this we are due from one piece of administrative and the now lies in a debt of British Interior. The prime minister has moved from London, and went to Edinburgh. He wants to Sir Tasmania and decide what shall and who should not be trusted to employ them. He fitted the Birmingham and the Yeomanry to have him out but his runs backward. The result depends on the rest of the people we got, we must an invention of work but it perhaps better than that of the missing mining missionary or the famine philanthropist.

Then filling up the General
[Handwritten text not legible]